

The FCC should regulate contracts between Cellular providers and consumers, as cellular providers are currently using the adage that once a consumer opens the box of the cellular phone, they immediately consent to a minimum one year contract. If this is the case, then why do providers offer two year, and even three year contracts?